If you are in search of furniture that communicates your commitment to classic style, made from high-quality materials, furniture that will be in your family for generations, you have found the place: K & M Hardwoods in Washington, Georgia.

Every piece of wood is selected especially for that piece of furniture. Exceptional materials, such as maple, cherry, curly maple, oak, mahogany and black walnut go into every single piece. We use classic techniques, such as mortise and tenon joints, dovetailing and hand sanding that ensure durability and beauty. We work with you to choose a finish that reflects your taste, your plans for the piece and the best use of the wood.

Then we sand by hand and finish each piece meticulously. The finished product is one of long-lasting strength and beauty. You should expect no less.

Our commitment to sustainability means that most of our wood comes from the Northern Appalachian Mountains and is sustainably harvested. This attention to detail, to your needs and to responsible production is what sets K&M Hardwoods apart.

A Bit About the Craftsman

Craftsman Steve Gillispie fell in love with making things in his first junior high shop class. He enjoyed working with his hands so much that he started working in construction while still in high school in Florida.

After high school, Steve served four years in the Marine Corps, but the wood kept calling. His construction experience led Steve to cabinet making which ultimately led to the master craftsmanship involved in the beautiful and intricate pieces he now creates.

Steve opened his workshop in Washington, GA in 2005. His business has flourished because of exceptional service and a focus on custom pieces to meet each customer's needs.

Windsor Collection

Patrick Gordon, who became Lieutenant Governor of Pennsylvania in 1726, imported the first Windsor chairs from England. Some believe the first American Windsor chairs, based on the traditional British design, were made in Philadelphia around 1730. The early designs and construction techniques have stood the test of time and Windsor chairs have been made almost continuously since then.

“Through-holed and wedged” is one of the primary means of joining Windsor chair parts. A cylindrical or slightly tapered hole is bored in the first piece, the matching cylindrical or tapered end of the second piece is inserted in the hole as a round tenon, and a wedge is driven into the end of this tenon, flaring it tight in the hole.

The excess portion of the wedge is then cut flush with the surface. This supplies a mechanical hold that will prevail when the glue fails. In general, early Windsor chair joints are held together mechanically, making glue a redundant detail in their assembly. (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Windsor_chair). This method requires precision and patience, but produces a chair that will stand up to heavy use in a variety of settings.

Our Windsor collection embodies Steve’s commitment to timeless design.
